Why this course is right for you

The power of words is incalculable, and by studying English Language at A-Level, you'll discover how we learned to speak, read, and write words as children.

You'll also learn how we grow up to manipulate words - either for our own personal gain or for the benefit of other people. In addition, you'll learn how to craft your own writing to suit a specific genre, audience or purpose.

As a result, you should study this subject if you're interested in how language has been used to oppress and/or liberate people around the world. You should also study this subject if you want to use words to help change the world.

Doing English, you'll develop analytical skills that are transferable to all subjects and sectors, whether they're arts or science-based. You'll also develop valuable research skills, which are highly valued by employers and admissions officers alike.
